SHOWS VIEWS TAKEN IN GERMAN LINES

Edwin F. Weigle Returns With Motion Pictures of Three War Theaters.

Visualizing history is what some student has called the motion pictures of the European war. Centralizing this vision on specific campaigns has been made possible in pictures like those which Edwin F. Weigle, photographer of the Chicago Tribune, has made from the German lines, and which are to be presented next week at the Casino Theater.

Mr. Weigle has had the cooperation of the officers of the German and Austrian armies along the actual battle lines, and has secured actual photographs. This is the first set of films showing actual battle scenes that have been made within the German lines—or rather from the German point of observation. The pictures were made possible by the latest advances in photographic apparatus such as the telephoto lens, which enables the photographer to get large images on his film from great distances, applying the field of vision to the camera.

Photographer Weigle spent eight days with the German and Austrian troops on the western line in France, and then he journeyed to Galicia, where he accompanied the German and Austrian armies in their drive through Poland. He was present at the fall of Przemyśl and later at Lemberg. During some of this time he was actually in the trenches with the fighting troops. From the extreme eastern front he went to the Tyrol, where he made pictures of the fighting against the Italians.

Having completed the set of films with views of each of the three important German movements he returned to the United States via Copenhagen. His films are being shown here, one-half the proceeds from the exhibitions going to the blind and crippled German and Austrian soldiers.

URGES NEW TYPE OF ART MUSEUM

H. T. Bailey Would Place Art Study Upon Relation to Civilization.

"What we need and what I want to see built here is a national museum of art, both for educational purposes and for the good of the common people," said Henry Turner Bailey in a lecture at the National Museum last evening. Case Bailey is here in sympathy with the Art and Archaeology League. He has made a "profound impression throughout the country both as a speaker and writer of no little moment. He is anxious to have erected in Washington a museum of arts that will be of use to the average man as well as the connoisseurs of art.

"The museums that we have in the country today are not calculated to be of much use to the common man," he affirms. "In fact, they are very confusing. Take, for instance, a Greek vase. It is broken in two, and the pieces are put together in a haphazard way. A Greek vase is a work of art, and it should be shown as such. It should be shown in its relation to civilization. In the center of the hall will be a large show case running the length of the room. This case will contain models of the world's most important buildings, from the Pyramids down to the White House. This case will be the same scale. Arranged in their respective places in regard to the scale of time, it will be an interesting study of the evolution of architecture.
